WHAT AILED TOM?

By WARD GRAHAM.

Tom descended on Ottawa Highlands like Mercury on a heaven-kissing hill. There had been a dearth of interesting and unattached males for months ever since the closing of the summer season, but Tom arrived as the eastern coast representative of a large automobile concern, opened up charming quarters in the new bank building and had five machines at his disposal as exhibits to prospective buyers.

Not only that, but he was a good mixer. He had known several of the girls' brothers at Yale. He had met them here and there in business. He knew Gladys Martin's aunt in Chicago and Louise Atsworth's grandfather in Louisville.

Yet, after four months, the girls of Ottawa began to take an inventory of Tom's capabilities, to speak. He measured up all right to their parents' standards, but as Louise put it:

"There's something about Tom that's wrong. I think he's too important." "No, he's just lucky. He seems to happen along always in the nick of time. I wonder," Gladys hesitated, her gray eyes dreamy and musing. "I wonder how many times he's been engaged."

"Three times right here in Ottawa Highlands," Beth Phillips said. "I was one of them. And I don't mind saying one bit that it only lasted two weeks."

There had been a committee meeting at Beth's home. A McCarrene bazaar was to be held in the town hall, and somehow, after all arrangements and plans had been settled, the talk had naturally drifted to Tom. There were four girls present. Beth, Gladys and Louise were old settlers at the Highlands, but Nan Rogers was a newcomer.

"Do I know him?" she asked. "You will," sighed Louise. "Nobody who comes here escapes him. But he won't bother you. He can't bear girls who have red hair."

"You ought to be glad of it, too, Nan," cried Beth. "He's impossible. He gets on your nerves because he always does the right thing, don't you know. You feel he was born fully equipped for life. What part are you going to take in the tableaux?"

"I want to be Queen Elizabeth because she had red hair, but I can't, so Gladys put me down as Good Luck. I believe I am to bear the magic symbol of a white horse upon my banner, carry a bouquet of four-leaf clovers and jingle some horseshoes, with swastikas sprinkled right plentifully over my gown."

"When I was engaged to Tom," began Gladys, in a purely offhand manner, "he told me he had a lot of lucky charms he'd picked up in his many rambles over the fair face of Mother Earth. Maybe he'd loan us some."

"I'll ask him for the charms as I go by tonight," said Nan, laughingly. "I'm afraid you'll all be cross to him."

The automobile office was well lighted as she came down Main street. It was half past four. Tom glanced up as the door swung breezily open and wondered why she walked past his desk to that of his assistant.

"Oh, Roswell, I wonder if you'd mind introducing me to Mr. Ames," she said mischievously. "I've got to borrow something from him for our bazaar, and he doesn't know me at all."

It was a splendid starter. Tom was willing, before she left, to pledge all five machines as well as the lucky charm to her service. He wondered vaguely how he could ever have avoided girls with red hair.

Only one thing she had said disturbed him.

"I don't believe you owe anything to yourself, Mr. Ames," she had said teasingly. "You're just lucky."

That bothered him. He went to the McCarrene bazaar with more than interest, and the other girls looked at Nan's conquest with pity.

Nan refused to flirt. She was frank and gay with him, brimful of good comradeship, but no sentiment.

"Listen just a minute," she flashed back impetuously. "You don't have to make love to me, Mr. Ames, just to be popular. I don't want to be engaged to you." She laughed at him. "Don't you think you could try and play a new record with me, say, a friendship duet?"

"Look out for your dress, Nan!" called Louise quickly, leaning over her table to try to reach Nan's elbow. But it was too late. She had leaned back against a little bunch of lighted candles on the candle table and the little licking tongue of fire ran to her shoulder, caught hungrily at her hair, her throat and breast. Just how he did it, Tom never quite knew. There was a scramble among those near as he whipped off his coat and wrapped it around her, lifted her in his arms and carried her outdoors. After the excitement was over, the girls at the candy table stared at one another.

"His hands were awfully burned," said Beth, softly.

"And when he knelt out there in the snow and put out the fire she put her arm around his neck. Then he wrapped her in his fur robe and took her home. Her mother went with them. Did you ever?"

"He's so lucky," Gladys laughed. "That he even saved Good Luck herself. Girls, all persons with red hair are witches."

FORGIVING JOHNSTON

A Story For Independence Day

By ESTHER VANDEVEER

"Grandpa, tell us a story, a story about a big war. Everything is about war nowadays. Tell us a Fourth of July story."

"I'll tell you about a man of peace who got mixed up with those who were bent on fighting. He was my grandfather, and he was a member of the Society of Friends. They are commonly called Quakers. My grandfather lived in Philadelphia, which was settled by Quakers. His name was Forgiving Johnston, and he was one of the pillars of the Society of Friends, whose principles were that if they were attacked they must not resist. He was a model of peace and patience."

"During the Revolutionary war Philadelphia was occupied for a good deal of the time by the British troops. Grandfather Johnston lived in the suburbs, and since he raised chickens and garden truck, as well as working a dairy, he was often plundered by the British soldiers, who came out from the city to forage on the country. He was a strong patriot, but as a Quaker would not resist the foragers. Of course his nonresistant principles became known among the soldiers, and since they could rob him with less danger than a fighting man they confined their attention to him till they had well nigh stripped him of everything he possessed."

"His children were obliged to bear all this, for none of them dared oppose him, but finally there came a time when they banded together to stop the plundering. There were Pardon and Daniel, his two sons—Daniel was my father—and Patience and Prudence, his two daughters. The boys conspired together that the next time a party of redcoats came on to the premises they would drive them off. Of course they could not do this with staves; they must use firearms. They made loopholes in the wooden walls of the barn and gathered there a stock of muskets and ammunition."

"The first thing the old man knew he heard firing in the direction of the barn. Looking out through a window, he saw half a dozen soldiers chasing his chickens about and puffs of smoke emanating from the sides of the barn. He understood what was going on and, stepping out on to the roof of the front porch, called out in a loud voice to his sons:

"Boys, cease this firing! It is better that every chicken in the yard should be taken than one drop of blood should be drawn."

"But either the boys did not hear him or if they did they paid no attention to his command. One of the soldiers fell, and his comrades ceased chasing the chickens and turned their attention to those in the barn. The troopers had short guns with them, for they were mounted men, and they began a fusillade, which drew a more rapid fire from my uncle and my father in the barn."

"The old gentleman, when he found that he could not stop his boys fighting, stalked back and forth on the porch roof, struggling with his desire to enter the fray himself. After a time he went into the house and brought out his rifle, but put the better of his pugnacity, stood the gun up against the house and resumed his walk. It was said that his lips moved in prayer to be saved from the sin of fighting."

"One of the girls, Prudence, was in the barn with her brothers, and she was firing through a loophole. The Johnston's ammunition was running low, and if not replenished they would lose the fight. Prudence volunteered to run the gun to the house and bring them more powder and lead, urging upon her brothers that the soldiers would not shoot a woman. They finally consented, and, emerging from the door, she ran like the wind to the house."

"The old man saw her coming and surmised what for. He shouted to her to run fast and at the same time, forgetting himself, used unseemly language to the soldiers, who were firing at her. Presently she stumbled and fell. Her father seized his rifle and, leaping from the roof, ran toward the soldiers. Possibly he thought it not quite so sinful to use his gun as a club as to fire it. At any rate, he ran in among the soldiers, his blows falling on them with the rapidity of lightning and the weight of a sledgehammer. Several of them fell with broken skulls, and the rest took to their heels."

"Now, my grandfather having driven them off, there was no need for him to commit a further sin by following them. But he did, and, since he could run faster than they, he kept well up with them and brought his rifle down on one of them with such force that the stock was shattered."

"The fight being over, the boys and girls went to the assistance of the wounded and with difficulty prevented their father from dispatching them. However, they carried them all into the house and attended to their wounds, nearly all of which had been given them by Mr. Forgiving Johnston. "Those soldiers who got away reported the trouble, and an aide to General Howe went out to the farm to look into it. He reported that the men had got just what they deserved."

Hon. Ben Frost of Chicago, arrived in this city today to enjoy a few happy hours with his old army chum, Sam Gary. Ben's name is deceiving for he is far from being a frost when it comes to spinning yarns or pulling off stunts to worry Sam.

James G. McVicker of Cresco, Ia., was here this week to see C. Eby on land matters. Mr. McVickers is very much taken up with Oneida county and predicts it has a great future. He thinks seriously of locating here.

KOLDEN'S

"The Quality Store"

WEEK'S EVENTS AT THE HIGH SCHOOL

Miss Myrtle Stocking of Lindenwood, Illinois, took charge of classes in Mathematics on Monday. The addition of this extra teacher will relieve the congestion in the classes in bookkeeping, mathematics and English.

Report cards for the first six weeks will be given to pupils in both High school and grades early next week. While many standings are more or less a matter of estimates by teachers, still they will well repay careful study by the parents. If pupils are not doing good work, now is the time to investigate the matter. Do not hesitate to come to the school house to see your child's teacher if you are not satisfied with the standings he receives. Teachers will be glad to see you and will do their best to show you what the trouble is.

The Superintendent would like to call attention to the fact, that if you are allowing your child to spend his evenings on the street or at places of entertainment you cannot expect him to do good work
